That's Where the Library Comes In

1. The search interface is like a gateway to literally thousands of informational resources, and it is pretty easy to use once you know your way around. Let's take a closer look at it.

2. Each of these tabs enables a different kind of search. The Catalog search is the default tab. This is a very broad search of the books, CDs, DVDs and electronic resources in the King Library collection. It also looks for articles in a selection of broad, interdisciplinary databases.

3. If you’re interested in just finding articles, use the Articles search. This is good for a broad search on your topic, but to find databases specific to your topic, you’ll want to visit the Articles & Databases page.

4. To look for articles in a specific magazine, journal, or newspaper, use the Journal Titles search. If we have online access, this will show you what database to use in order to find articles in that particular title.

5. If you’re looking for a print version, you’ll need to search on the journal title using the Catalog search.

6. Sometimes your professors will put a print copy of a textbook or an article in the library for your class to use. The Course Reserves search helps you find out what’s available and where to check it out.

7. The Site Search tab lets you search the library website for specific information on our services and policies.

8. This has been a very basic explanation of the King Library's search interface. If you have complicated information need or would like some help, please ask a librarian.
